We describe a patient with segmentary cervicogenic headache that was accompanied by hyperactivity of the ocular and facial muscles and neck muscles during sleep. Cervical dystonia was demonstrated by electromyography, and both positive and negative findings were obtained from single fiber electromyography of the neck muscles. The activities of the ipsilateral ocular and facial muscles and contralateral neck muscles were similar to those of the upper and lower cranial nerves, respectively. The response to administration of anticholinesterase was confirmed by testing, and the duration of the response was prolonged when the reaction was exaggerated, as the response to cycloplegic was exaggerated. Changes in tone in the neck muscles, as demonstrated by electromyography, have 82157476af
